Comments

KStN 1114 in this model of the Schützen battalion doubled the allocation of light machine guns from nine to 18 per Schützen Company, and at time of writing I have found no reason for this increase. I've assumed in the above that it resulted in two light machine guns per Rifle Squad, however what is not clear is whether it was intended that the Squad should use both in the dismounted role. There was no commensurate increase in pistols for the Company, which might suggest that the four LMG numbers per Squad were now to operate as two teams, each of two men, all armed with pistols and serving one LMG per team. It is possible that the intention was to increase the anti-aircraft capability of the Company, with an MG34 on each Kfz.70 carrying a half Rifle Squad, and subsequently evolved into the later organization of two LMGs per Schützen (and later Panzer Grenadier) Squad.

Notes on reconstruction

Unfortunately, the KStN tables for the Rifle Company (ref 1114) and the Machine Gun Company (ref 1116) of the Schützen Battalion, dated 1st October 1937, both appear to be lost. The descriptions of these two elements in the forgoing have therefore been reconstructed using alternative contemporary sources, plus some guesswork.

Contemporary sources

Primarily, an undated document included in the holdings of the US National Archives and Records Administration (NARA), seemingly in file NARA T78 R659 H36/161. This is a 'pictograph' rather than a full KStN table, and omits full details of ranks, vehicle types and weapons. Also, it does not appear to be based on the 1937 KStN tables, nor the succeeding February 1941 versions. My personal guess is they were an initial draft of the February 1941 Schützen Regiment tables, and they do match the overall organization for the Panzer Division as shown in the Gliederung charts for November 1940.

Secondly are the Special Appendices to the German Army Mobilisation Plan, for the period March 1939 to March 1940. One of these gives information on the vehicles authorised under all of the governing KStN tables for the Schützen Battalion, and includes the vehicle type and which subunit it was to be used by, and sometimes its intended load. There is though no information on the vehicles of the various Baggage Trains. There are also a series of summaries for the various types of Panzer Division and Leichte Division of the pre-war period, which include a single line entry for their particular model of Schützen Battalion and, where applicable, the Kradschützen Battalion.

Supplementing these are summaries for the various elements of the Battalion given in the Handbook for the General Staff in War, dated August 1939. These give summaries for each KStN, showing the breakdown of personnel by rank groups (O, B, G and M), the number of rifles and support weapons, and the number of motor vehicles. The latter is subdivided into cars and trucks, which are then further shown as light, medium and heavy, and also motorcycles, both solo and with sidecars.

Deductions

The Schützen Rifle Company and the MG Company are largely based on the undated pictograph. In both cases transport has been amended in line with that given in the Mobilisation Plan figures for 1939. I have worked on the basis that the Schützen Battalions of the Panzer Divisions were only slightly modified versions of the Battalions found in the normal Infantry Regiment, and all shared the same subunit organization for Rifle Platoons, MG Platoons and half-Platoons and 8-cm Mortar Platoons.

Company Trains offer the greatest margin for error. I've assumed that posts for personnel such as armourers, clerks, cooks, tailors and shoemakers remained constant across Company types.

My thanks to Massimo Baroffi for providing the Mobilisation Plan and Staff Handbook information, which gave me some actual figures to work with and eliminated a great deal of the guesswork.

If anyone happens to have any contemporary information on the actual organization of the Battalion then please drop me an email via the home page, which can be reached at the below link.
